With support from the Swiss Agency for Development and Cooperation (SDC), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) has helped since 2004 to reverse pollution in one of the oldest freshwater ecosystems on Earth, the Lake Prespa - a Balkan biodiversity hotspot.

the lake. A state-of-the-art composting plant also generates healthy profits from tons of organic waste that would earlier have been dumped into the lake. The 80 percent of residents who depend on apple farming are also now benefiting from new agricultural methods that have reduced costs and increased yields.

As a result of this project implemented by UNDP in Skopje, water quality has improved and indigenous fish species have recovered thanks to a 30 percent reduction in pesticide use and new sewage-treatment facilities in this part of
